I think that having international students in Japanese high schools would bring many benefits. First, we could learn about different cultures, customs, and ways of thinking. This would help us become more open-minded and respectful of others. For example, we could share food, music, and stories from our countries and learn from each other. Second, it would be a great chance to practice English in real conversations. We usually study English in class, but we don't often use it in daily life. Talking with international students would make learning English more fun and useful. Finally, having friends from other countries could inspire us to travel, study abroad, or think about global issues like the environment or peace. I believe international students would make Japanese high schools more exciting, more educational, and more connected to the world.
