| When I first met one of my classmates in junior high school, I thought he was unfriendly because he didn't talk much and always looked serious. I believed he didn't want to be friends with anyone, so I avoided talking to him. But one day, we were put in the same group for a school project and had to work closely together for several weeks. To my surprise, he turned out to be very kind, funny, and full of interesting ideas. He wasn't unfriendly—he was just shy and careful around people he didn't know well. After spending time together, we became good friends. This experience taught me not to judge people too quickly based on first impressions. Everyone has a different personality, and sometimes we just need to be more patient and understanding. Now, I try to keep an open mind and take time to get to know others better. | | | | | | | | | |
